Here is another standard taken from CFOCB/CFOC dealing with ECE pre-service training.

Feb 12, 2016, 11:26 AM

Rick Fiene updated his status.

I would like to start a discussion related to early care and education (ECE) quality with the publication of Caring for Our Children Basics (CFOCB), the new voluntary health and safety standards published by the Administration for Children and Families last summer. This discussion should occur throughout the ECE field but not be limited to this arena because these new voluntary standards should be viewed by all parents of children in ECE programs and these same parents should be advocating for their adoption by all ECE programs. Grandparents should be involved in encouraging their children who have children in ECE programs because these CFOCB standards are a first step to establishing a caring environment that will be safe and healthy for children in out-of-home settings. Something that I am personally concerned about as a grandparent of three preschool and school age grandchildren. This is a discussion that needs to occur outside the USA as well because even though other countries have standards at a higher level with staffing and training, generally their health and safety standards can be lacking based upon recent research comparing standards between other countries and the USA.

CFOCB is based upon the latest research in the field which has accumulated over the past five decades and although the standards are very basic and do not necessarily ensure a high quality ECE program, the standards do establish a baseline to safe and healthy ECE which is a starting point.

For those interested readers, please go to the following website to see CFOCB:
(<http://www.acf.hhs.gov/pro.../.../caring-for-our-children-basics>).

For those who want to find out more about some of the research that supports CFOCB, please go the following website: (<http://rikoinstitute.com/>).

I plan in future posts to select standards from CFOCB and talk about their significance for protecting children.

I look forward to a continuing dialogue with interested individuals.

Caring for Our Children Basics was just recently published by the Administration for Children and Families. For families who are searching for early care and education programs for their children, this new set of voluntary foundational health and safety standards will be of tremendous value. Here is the website for those families who may be interested:

I am hoping to establish a dialogue regarding early care and education (ECE) program quality. I am sharing the RIKI Website (<http://rikoinstitute.wikispaces.com/home>) with interested individuals so they can see some of the latest research and thinking regarding improving program quality in ECE. I hope to hear from parents, researchers, students, policy makers, and anyone else interested in discussing the key components to ECE program quality.
